

Dear Colleagues,

I am writing to let you know that I will retire as CEO of WellLife Network at the end of June. There is never a perfect time for this type of transition, but now is the right time.

It has been over 13 years since I began my journey with WellLife. During that time there have been many changes and expansions in the agency, including its name. I am proud of the growth we have achieved together. We have extended our reach and the services offered, while doubling our annual operating budget. Today, WellLife is a $112 million health and human services network that is a regional leader in the field, serving more than 25,000 individuals and families each year.

This is a time of important transformation for WellLife Network. Our new Senior Leadership team is outstanding and I have complete confidence in their vision and abilities. Sherry Tucker is an exceptional leader and she will do an excellent job in her new role as CEO.

Our mission and the strategy we have generated for sustained growth is world class. Our organization is poised for the challenges that lie ahead in a person-centered and value-based environment.

I admire the way we embrace change and partner with other non-profits and corporations to help people with developmental disabilities, mental health and substance abuse challenges thrive and succeed. I think our greatest strength is found in the diversity of the individuals and families we serve and in your passion and commitment in helping them become more independent and contributing members of the community.

Know that you are part of one of the best teams in the field. I know I can count on all of you to continue the tradition of helping others and be passionate about improving their future. I look forward to seeing all the terrific places WellLife will go in the future. I wish you all well. Let's do ourselves and the people we serve proud.

Sincerely,

Alan M. Weinstock
CEO
